

Answer Key

Sex Assigned at Birth: The name-boy, girl or intersex-someone is given at birth based on what their genitals look like.

Intersex: The name given at birth to someone who may have a combination of genital body parts, or genitals that look like one sex, but inside, they have body parts of a different sex.

Gender: All the social stuff that goes with the sex you're assigned at birth; like how people are told they're supposed to dress or act.

Gender Identity: What a person knows their gender to be. This might or might not match what their genitals look like.

Gender Expression: The way a person shows their gender identity, typically through their appearance, dress, and behavior.

Cisgender: When someone's sex assigned at birth matches what they know their gender to be.

Transgender: When someone's sex assigned at birth is different from what they know their gender to be.

Gender Stereotyping: Making assumptions about someone's gender based on what they see on the outside; often used to limit people.

Unique: Being one of a kind; unlike anyone else.

Inclusion: Allowing everyone to be part of the group or providing equal access to opportunities and resources especially to those who are often excluded or marginalized.

Sex Assigned at Birth

Intersex

Gender

Gender Identity

Gender Expression

Cisgender

Transgender

Stereotype

Unique

Inclusion

The name-boy, girl or intersex-someone is given at birth based on what their genitals look like.

The name given at birth to someone who may have a combination of genital body parts, or genitals that look like one sex, but inside, they have body parts of a different sex.

All the social stuff that goes with the sex you're assigned at birth; like how people are told they're supposed to dress or act.

What a person knows their gender to be. This might or might not match what their genitals look like.

The way a person shows their gender identity, typically through their appearance, dress, and behavior.

When someone's sex assigned at birth matches what they know their gender to be.

When someone's sex assigned at birth is different from what they know their gender to be.

Making assumptions about someone's gender based on what they see on the outside; often used to limit people.

Being one of a kind; unlike anyone else.

Allowing everyone to be part of the group or providing equal access to opportunities and resources especially to those who are often excluded or marginalized.

